

THE CLAIM

Going viral is now the worst thing you can do for citations.

Reach and authority stopped being the same thing. The posts that AI engines quote are not the ones your feed rewards.

You optimised for the feed. The machine reads something else.

Every hour spent chasing reach is an hour not spent on the thing that actually gets lifted.

Method: 325,000 prompts collected January to February 2026 across ChatGPT Search, Google AI Mode and Perplexity, restricted to professional and business topics.

Caveat, and it matters: these are professional and business prompts only. On all-topic datasets LinkedIn does not rank this high. Treat it as your audience, not a universal law.

LinkedIn is now read like a website, not like a feed.

STEP 01

You publish a post or an article

STEP 02

The engine crawls and indexes it

STEP 03

It is quoted inside the answer

SHARE OF AI ANSWERS CITING LINKEDIN	11%
RANK ON BUSINESS PROMPTS	#2
CREATORS VS PAGES ON CHATGPT	59% creators

No link, no click, no referral needed for the citation to happen. The mention itself is the asset.

The posts that get quoted are tiny.

LinkedIn posts in the dataset.

CITED POST LENGTH	50 – 299 words
RESHARES CITED	Almost none

Three moves. None of them are fun.

01 Pick one topic and own it for 90 days

Roughly half of the cited authors posted five or more times in four weeks. Frequency on one subject beats range.

02 Write 50 to 299 words that answer a real question

No hook theatre and no cliffhanger. A question someone actually types, answered completely.

03 Count citations, not likes

Saves and shares are the better signal. A 19-reaction post that gets quoted beats a viral one that gets scrolled.

THE TAKEAWAY

Save this. Then go write the boring
post.

The one that answers a question properly instead of performing for an algorithm that stopped rewarding performance.
